Regulating Religion and Belief in Comparative Perspective

Mona ORABY
Indiana University Maurer School of Law

Mona Oraby is the Jerome Hall Postdoctoral Fellow in the Center for Law, Society, and Culture at Indiana University Maurer School of Law. She specializes in the study of comparative law and religion with a regional focus on the Middle East. She has ongoing interests in secularism and secularity, the relationship between conversion and modern governance, as well as the legal processes through which religious majorities and minorities are constructed over time.
